Evidence for serotonergic control of reproduction in the female eel (Anguilla anguilla) during the spawning season. Serotonin (5-HT) plays a role in the control of numerous functions in vertebrates, including the hypothalamic control of reproduction. We have recently shown in the ovine species, sheep, that plasma 5-HT increases significantly during the season of ovulation and that this increase is accompanied by a significant elevation in the concentration of the 5-HT metabolite 5-HIAA in the hypothalamus. The present study was performed in order to determine if similar seasonal changes in plasma and hypothalamic 5-HT and 5-HIAA concentrations occur in the female eel Anguilla anguilla. Plasma 5-HT and hypothalamic 5-HIAA were determined by HPLC in A. anguilla females during the spawning season. In both sexes, an increase in 5-HT was found in the plasma during the spawning season, whereas 5-HIAA was unchanged. In the females, the concentrations of both substances were significantly correlated. 5-HT in the plasma of females was significantly correlated with the plasma concentrations of progesterone, and 5-HIAA was significantly correlated with oestradiol concentrations.
