Facebook Messenger is a web-based instant messenger and SMS service. It is developed and maintained by Facebook, Inc. for users in the United States and European Union. Features of Facebook Messenger include access to messages and calls between Facebook users, as well as chatting via webcam and voice over IP. To keep Messenger free from spam, most users will have to set their messages to be delivered. The permissions users are asked to grant can vary, but usually include access to their messages and contact lists, as well as user's location. Once set up, Messenger will allow users to check a status update or receive a call or an instant message. The status update lets you send a message to the user and the option to call or IM is either through the user's own phone or via Skype. To enable Skype integration, Facebook account holders must share a Skype profile and allow the application to access their contacts. Additionally, users must grant access to their microphone and camera. The application works independently from other IMs, such as the original Facebook Chat feature or Facebook Groups. Status Updates and Conversations Messenger enables users to view and interact with other users. There are three different views available, listed on the left. The left-hand page shows a timeline of status updates, grouped according to the conversation and includes a number of options. Users will be able to see updates from pages, groups, and individual users. According to the privacy settings, users will only be shown updates from the selected source. The center page shows a conversation list, with each new message appearing on the top of the list. To reply to a message, users need to press enter or click on the number displayed at the left side of the interface. The right-hand page shows users' contact list and it includes the option to call or IM the selected user.
