What's New in the?

Developed with the latest web technologies, Widgetoko is a very interesting and useful piece of software that provides you with a straightforward way of tapping into the Twitter stream and capturing tweets in real-time based on any search filter you supply. To deploy it on your computer simply launch the app's streamlined installer that takes care of everything on its own, without any type of user intervention on your part. Uncomplicated multiple-step configuration procedure In order to use the app, you're also required to establish a connection to the Twitter Stream and generate four access tokens. To do this, make sure that you're logged into Twitter using your computer's default web browser and heads over to the app's Options section (from the File menu) and click the register link from the top.

You'll be redirected to the Twitter new app registration, and you just need to input the application details, accept the developer agreement, and create the app. Go to Keys and Access Tokens tab and make sure you click the "Create access token" from the bottom to ensure that all four tokens are available. All that's left to do now is copy the tokens from the browser directly into Widgetoko's configuration section. Simple and efficient app for capturing tweets in real-time As we're sure you've noticed, Widgetoko is a very novice-

Straight off, Widgetoko captures all tweets, in real-time, that contain the term you've specified. It may seem pretty elementary, but Widgetoko is actually a well-thought-out utility. For starters, it comes with support for Windows native notifications, it features taskbar integration and, even more surprisingly, it boats a Dark theme as well. Want to be the first one to capture tweets on various subjects? If so, this app is surely worth your while.
