Video Editing is a process of modifying a video or video clip, to change the content, mood, or style. It allows users to creatively extract a "videoclip" (i.e. a short segment of video) from an existing video and manipulate it for some specific purpose. Because videos are usually recorded on a camera or portable video device, video editing is most often done on a personal computer rather than dedicated video editing software. Most video editing applications on the consumer market are designed for users familiar with basic video editing and require no prior video editing experience. Video editing is done using various types of clip such as audio-visually, pictures, text, transitions, effects, graphical shapes and overlays and background music. Editing audio and video together is called mixing. Advanced video editing software supports a wide range of features, such as titles, transitions, effects, freeze frames, audio mixing, and other effects. The final product, whether a DVD or web-based, will have different requirements depending on how it will be displayed. These different types of videos are usually captured in different ways depending on the type of media or output device. In this section of Popular Video Formats, we will go over the various types of video files and how you can use them in your projects. Main Formats: Video Editing: the way it is usually thought as, although this term has an older meaning as well. The modes for video editing may range from simple cut and paste to highly sophisticated advanced tools. The output format will depend on your client. For example, an early aa67ecbc25
