Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method of controlling the operation of a reaction path system for joining a plurality of metal sheets and, more particularly, to a method of compensating for temperature variations between the metal sheets along the length of the reaction path. 2. Description of the Related Art It is known in the art to join a plurality of metal sheets by taping a plurality of metal sheets together with a phenol resin adhesive tape. Such a method of manufacturing a metal composite article is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,255,068 to Koio. The method disclosed by Koio includes use of a phenol resin adhesive tape to join a plurality of metal sheets. The phenol resin adhesive tape includes a body made from a film of a cross-linked phenol resin and a pair of pressure sensitive adhesive layers on the side surfaces of the body. The metal sheets to be joined are first taped together with the phenol resin adhesive tape in a configuration in which each of the metal sheets is a mirror image of one of the other metal sheets and the edges of the metal sheets which will become the seams of the finished metal composite article, as well as the support structure which will carry and reinforce the seams of the finished metal composite article, are engaged by the pressure sensitive adhesive on the body of the tape. The edges of the metal sheets which will become the seams of the finished metal composite article are next heated, and the body of the adhesive tape is pulled away from the edges of the sheets, leaving the metal sheets in place with the phenol resin adhesive tape disposed between each of the metal sheets to bond the metal sheets together. The edges of the metal sheets which will become the seams of the finished metal composite article are then manually finished to obtain a smooth, flawless surface. The finished metal composite article is then installed on a supporting structure such as a tooling plate or a fixture which supports the finished metal composite article during manufacture of the finished metal composite article by injection molding or forging processes. The above method, however, has not always
