Elden Ring [Win/Mac]

This game is simply awesome! Its very fun and challenging, the character management is easy to understand. I can play this game online with my friends. Any game that can create such a world and such amazing characters is definitely one of my favorite games of all time. Fun to play and just plain fun. The combat system is great, easy to understand and quick and when you do something wrong the consequences are quite amusing. The characters all have their own goals and motivations which makes the story and characters even more fun. This game is one of the very few games out there that captures the magic of RPG games like Fire Emblem GBA. This is a great game, non-stop action that never lets up. The graphics are great and the story is great and the gameplay is great. This game is fantastic. It's an action RPG that feels like a boardgame. There's no voice acting or talking, just the music and story of the Lands Between. The battle system is unique, fun, and satisfying. The character development is fun, and there are a LOT of options to choose from. The multiplayer options are awesome and the game is fully customizable. This is a fantastic game that any one with a love for RPG games should own.

Q: how to dynamically create a linq query? i have an entity called Appointments, it has a attribute called Date, which is a DateTime type. I'm looking for a way to dynamically create a linq query for getting all the appointments for a given day. The Appointments entity is very simple. I have two entities, the appointments and the User, and I want to select all the Appointments which a user has been given permission to see. So far I have a method which takes a date as a parameter and returns the first day of that month: public static List Days(int year, int month) { if ((year 12)) return new List(); else return new List {DateTime.Now.AddDays(new Random().Next(0, 31)).Date}.OrderBy(x => x).ToList(); } Now, that works fine, but it creates a static

Pls don't steal.NASA: Prokaryotes in the Caves of Mars Scientists are proposing Mars as a potential habitat for life after finding water ice in a remote area of the planet's surface and discovering bacteria in its caves. This rare find would give credence to the theory of life existing on Mars today, however, it's very unlikely that we will ever be able to discover life in the planet's caves. The discovery of water ice was made by the NASA-funded Mars Express, which has been exploring the surface of the planet for the past six years. It detected the water ice by looking at ground that's covered by rocks and dust, which has the appearance of lichen. The vegetation grows better in warm conditions. Using cameras and heat sensors that can detect sunlight, scientists located an area where the appearance is more like green plants. "The discovery of ice on Mars strengthens evidence for subsurface liquid water near the mid-latitudes," said Kevin M. Gill, a research scientist at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, California. "With a little more of this kind of instrumentation we could search for life at other locations on Mars." The observation of life was made by the European Space Agency's Mars Express and Mars Odyssey. Life in the planet's caves would be even more unlikely to be found, but this discovery could help build a community to answer any questions about life in the caves.
