I was hoping for a more fully automatic way of inputting web-based images in Lightroom 5. I understand that, with this version, you use the new automated workflows pretty often. The feature isn't bad. I'm just not as enthusiastic about it. I know that Lightroom 5 has somewhat automatic conversion functions. However, judging from the predicted automatic functions in the next version (will there be one?), this version is getting there. That's why when I see an exciting new app on PCMag, I'll put it through its paces to make sure it excels in the right ways. I've tested all three products, and I would say I'm confident saying one is clearly superior and others are decidedly not. I'll go into my personal preference in Lightroom below, but it's really the first two programs I'd recommend. For the closest photo editing experience to Photoshop, I can't recommend Adobe's Photo Stream. It's a bit too basic, and I can't think of any use-cases that would benefit from the seamless workflow. " The new tools and changes coming to Photoshop in Lightroom 5 are a poignant huff of air freshening as it were. They seem complimentary of the more familiar tools in the application, and they're a breath of fresh air to an interface that has changed little since it was introduced in 1987. New features in Photoshop are introduced rarely and in small doses. With Lightroom, it seems like a good developer purposely introduces features every six months or so, likely to keep their application users savvier than their competition.

The layers panel has been completely redesigned to bring it closer to the renamed Shape panel of the past. Layers -- previously known as the assets panel -- now feature a new set of dynamic information displays, such as information about the layer's source, the position of the layer in its grouping, and the number of shapes in the layer. There's also a new set of icons, which let you quickly identify layer groups or freeze/unfreeze layers with quick shortcuts. Deleting layers from the Layers panel also received a facelift. Now, you'll once again see an icon for each layer in your document, and the button beside the layer makes it clear which layers are visible and openable from the panel. The tools panel has long been one of my favorite enhancements to the toolset. It now features a new set of dynamic tooltips, including the selection history panel in the background, and tooltips for non-selected tools. Adobe has also overhauled the Brush tool. An entirely new Brush feature is now available in both Photoshop and Ink & Shape for free. The tool offers a new set of keystrokes to snap, zoom, and move the brush, which replaces the old deadzone brush options. The new Adobe Creative Cloud All-You-Can-Eat Licenses will include:
