Adobe's wireless standard that allows you to use a series of most likely other iPads, iPhones, and laptops as a display screen for your own created content and share it with others (using the attendeeio mobile sharing platform) is pretty sweet, too. It's a very safe bet that Adobe will continue to steer the boat in this area. The software has been party to a private beta program for awhile now, and it seems that Adobe is taking user experience feedback seriously. If you've been through the app a few times, you know the two big issues: You can't move any elements outside the image area while working, especially with a set of selection tools; and the Quick Selection tool—not to mention the paintbrush—basically do nothing in many instances, especially when drawing shapes. This instance is a nice compromise between function and ease of use, and it's a big step forward for creative photographers who strive for minimal artist's touch in their images. Adobe Bridge: To be honest, Adobe Bridge is one of the main reasons I'm stuck with Photoshop. It's my favorite app for organizing files, and the online and offline catalogs work amazingly well. There's a manual, a PDF of our sample photos that you can refer to when you want to review some of our editing options. The Lens correction settings document is particularly interesting, since it shows a real-life example of the automatic lens correction that seems to be getting better and better in this version of Photoshop. Now you can choose the details of the correction, and see how the Lens Correction dialog box resizes and moves your images. All the lens correction settings you can apply in this dialog box are available in Settings under Preferences, Adjustment & Lens in the Image & Adjustments panel.

Timestamps are usually found in the top right of the photo, and typically look like little ticks or little numbers next to the time and date. Our time and date can be changed in the Timeline panel, but that's a time-consuming process that doesn't always work as well as it should. Cameras are cameras that take multiple photos at once that can be joined together to make a single bigger team image. Unfortunately, many people's home and office cameras only take one picture at a time, and it often looks like the picture's have been split apart or are out of alignment.
