Simplicity is the most difficult aspect of the two apps to choose between. Easier to use, more powerful, Photoshop Elements is fuller-featured. Lightroom's quick features to peel apart photos like frames, backgrounds, add text, and so on is much quicker to draw with your tablet, while retaining the ability to tweak the photos to your liking. The iPad Pro and Apple Pencil are a powerful set up for either artist, but really only for true professionals. And for those of us on the pro/professional side of things, or enthusiast side of things, its a matter of love too long. For a full acquaintance with all the brush and digital painting apps on iPad, consult the reviews at SimpleReviewsHD.com . Another iPad for artists. This months newsletter from Adobe tells of the new Photoshop Sketch iPad app. This is linked with the new Pencil 2 tablet. I have to admit that testing the software made Adobe's Photoshopgo Pro package look pretty compelling, but I'm still leery on the need for an app that can ONLY work with an iPad! Of course, there may be some digital artist that would be willing to take the gamble. As it is, Apple has a perfectly good Adobe software package and why would you want an iPad app that limits your tools? By the time you read this, the new version number for the iPad will likely have barely changed. However, new in version 23 of the Photoshop suite are two new tools that can be used with the iPad pro. These are Adobe Sketch tools and Adobe Photoshop Sketch tips which bring a new level of touch onto digital painting with the user able to express themselves and paint on their iPad like never before. Just as you would do with a real canvas, you can add an under painting, overlay, or background, and then refine any details. Sketch and Photoshop Sketch are free for iPad and, as with other iPads apps, they can be used online as well. You can, of course, also still use Photoshop if you want a more traditional paint environment. For more information and an eight minute tutorial, click through to the following link:
