During amelogenesis, low protein levels in the tissue fluid (TF) induce a decrease in the relative thickness of the collagenous component. This study investigated the relationship between these variations and amelogenesis in hydrochoerine dental enamel. Samples of inner enamel (IE) and enamel dentin junction (EDJ) were obtained from capybaras (Hydrochoerus hydrochaeris) killed at various embryonic stages and TF samples were obtained from the same tissues during enamel formation. It was observed that the decrease in thickness of the collagenous component occurred earlier and more abruptly in samples from the IE region than in those from the EDJ. The morphological study of these samples revealed that ameloblast nuclei that are present at the periphery of the IE region are surrounded by a circular zone of ameloblasts that are arranged as a monolayer. In contrast, the layer of ameloblasts at the EDJ is multilayered. These data indicate that the collagen component of enamel is differentially organized according to its embryological origin. In TF, the profiles of components did not show differences in thickness nor any significant changes in relation to variation in embryonic age. The amino acid
