In my experience, I've found software companies still to be genuine in what they build and what they do, not driven by the nagging sense of "I have a better idea" that leaves many brilliant technologists behind. The experience remains poignantly similar whether you use the Adobe Creative Cloud model or the more affordable alternatives like Corel PaintShop Pro on Windows or iColorize on Android. It's the same software, the same features, sometimes a bit more fancy, but overall an experience I don't mind. Developing for the iPhone from iPhone isn't just an expedient way to get your app into users' hands; the size of the device, the lack of a physical keyboard in a non-textual environment, and the shift in focus from the carefully curated App Store to the unwieldy Mac App Store means an app's success isn't high on the agenda in Apple's open source iPhone shop. I'm not pretending to be an expert here, but after being around these kinds of things for some time, I found a few things that help me along the way. In iOS, we generally use the Xcode IDE and the Apple dev tools like Instruments and Assistant, and even if we built the app in a text editor, it wouldn't matter. These tools help developers become experts and stay on top of the dynamic and ever-changing changes in the system. But at the other end, speed and execution are everything. Sending data over the Internet, or whatever, or even over AirPlay to iPads and iPhones, even in the most trivial apps, can be significantly time consuming and can frustrate users.
